

Family & Relationships

It's a sad fact of life that an increasing number of relationships fail. Whether you are married or living with your partner, the consequences of any relationship breakdown can be traumatic and far-reaching. At such a time, Stephensons can offer the practical legal support you need, as well as arranging assistance with other issues such as finance and child welfare. Our large and experienced team helps both individuals and couples to find the best solution to their particular situation. Our focus is on achieving an amicable outcome, through methods such as collaboration and mediation.

We can help with

Unmarried couples

We can offer pre-nuptial (for couples getting married) and co-habitation (for couples planning on living together) agreements, setting out your rights and responsibilities early on in a relationship. Such arrangements not only ensure the greatest legal rights, they also help to minimise arguments and settle differences in the unfortunate event of a relationship breakdown.

Divorce and separation

Whether married or living together, there are a lot of things to sort out when a relationship breaks down. We can help to take care of all the personal and financial aspects that arise, such as fairly dividing your house, belongings and business interests and ensuring fair contact with your children.

Disputes concerning children

When children are involved, their welfare has to take priority. We can fight for contact rights on behalf of parents or other family members and will deal with Social Services if appropriate. However, we are firm believers in finding amicable resolutions where possible, to minimise the upset felt by children.

Financial settlements and property disputes

A breakdown often leads to disputes over property and finance. This can be especially problematic in the case of unmarried couples, but also contentious for many married couples too. Taking into consideration your overall financial situation, we can fight for your share or defend your rights over your home and other important assets. We are particularly experienced in negotiating settlements where the claims are substantial or complex, involving for example, pensions and family-owned businesses.
